It usually starts in adulthood and is characterized by twisting and turning of the neck and bulging of the eyes, shoulders, and muscles in the throat. These movements can make it hard to eat or drink, causing an inability to talk. Torsion dystonia affects between 1 in 100,000 and 400,000 people, although this number is growing. People with torsion dystonia also sometimes experience pain in their limbs, especially their feet. Sometimes, the trigger is emotional stress and the person may flop around or fall over while under stress. The disease usually gets worse over time. There is no cure, but symptoms may improve as the disease progresses. Why it's important: Torsion dystonia is more common in women than men. The condition is rarely diagnosed until adulthood. Early diagnosis is important because torsion dystonia can cause severe complications. It can also cause sufferers to have difficulty eating and drinking, which can cause weight loss and malnutrition. Signs and symptoms: The first sign of torsion dystonia is usually a noticeable bulge or dip in the muscles of the neck. The neck may also bend in several different directions. Sometimes, the neck is so stiff that a person can't move it. Other signs are in the eyes. One eye may look perfectly normal, while the other bulges out and in. People with torsion dystonia may also have trouble swallowing food or water. This can cause dehydration and malnutrition. Torsion dystonia is caused by problems with the brain and nervous system. In the early stages of the disease, most people have symptoms in the eye, but as the condition progresses, problems with movement in the hands and legs may also develop. Exams and tests: Doctors
