Q: Compression of various files using GZIP I want to compress some files using the GZIP tool. I've found a lot of different ways to do it but I don't know which one to use in my Linux OS for the following file format: Name of file: |$.am|$ Extension: |$.am| The extension can be anything. It's a language file. What I want to do is to compress all files in a folder. The file structure can be anything like files|files|files|files\... How can I do this with GZIP? (I'm coding in C++ and I'm working on Linux) A: Compress using gzip (in combination with external program) The first idea is the one you are looking for, is to compress using gzip. But first you should know that gzip is a program that compresses data. So what does that mean? gzip is a binary program (in Linux, or find "gzip" under the "bin" folder), who is implemented in zlib (also another library). zlib is the foundation of gzip. What does it do? It takes data and compresses it (meaning to make it smaller). You can use gzip when you have files containing data, and you want that data to compress. Let's look at an example: Say that you have a text file with a lot of data: cat ~/yourfile.txt My name is Jhon and I study at University of North of Carolina. You know how to do gzip compression by hand using the compression functions of zlib. And you could do : zcat ~/yourfile.txt | gzip > ~/yourfile.gz And when you do that (the zcat and the gzip) you are using the internal functions of zlib to compress your data. Using GZIP in an external program You could use gzip as an option (of an external program) to compress and compress your files. There are many programs who have a "compress" option, and it's all based on the same principle. Here is an example: cat yourfile.txt | gzip -c > yourfile.gz gzip is an external program (in Linux it's in /usr/bin/g
