Development and prognostic implications of a novel multivariate model in patients with T2N0 M0 non-small cell lung cancer: Propensity score matching analysis. To devise a novel multivariate model for predicting postoperative prognosis in patients with T2N0 M0 non-small cell lung cancer (NSCLC) and to validate the model in a separate prospective cohort of T2N0M0 patients. A total of 1621 patients with T2N0M0 NSCLC were consecutively treated between January 2000 and July 2015 at a single institute. Primary endpoint was overall survival (OS); secondary endpoints included progression-free survival (PFS), local control (LC), distant control (DC), local recurrence rate, and distant metastasis rate. A prognostic index was derived from five pre-existing models, and new models were constructed based on the type of each risk factor included in each model. Predictive accuracy was measured by the concordance index (C-index). Propensity score matching analysis was performed to assess the validity of the new model. Among the 1621 patients, 29.3% (481/1621), 42.6% (719/1621), 29.3% (485/1621), and 5.2% (86/1621) had high-, medium-, low-, and very low-risk, respectively. The new multivariate model comprising age, sex, tumour diameter, lymph node status, histology, resection status, and the number of intrapulmonary metastases (Ipm) achieved the best C-index (0.668). A novel multivariate model comprising of age, sex, tumour diameter, lymph node status, histology, resection status, Ipm, and chemotherapy can predict OS for T2N0M0 NSCLC patients with high accuracy.

Enzyme Histochemical Detection of Adhesion Molecules in Endometriosis: Correlation with the Microscopic Architecture of Adipose Tissue. The aim of the study was to evaluate the adhesion molecules in peritoneal endometriosis using enzyme histochemical methods and to correlate the enzymatic activity with the microscopic characteristics of the peritoneal adipose tissue of the endometriosis patients. The enzyme histochemical findings and ultrastructural evidence showed the presence of focal inflammatory infiltrates consisting of lymphocytes, monocytes, macrophages, and polymorphs, as well as of focal increased levels of vimentin-positive mesothelial cells. In the adipose tissue of endometriosis, enzyme histochemical findings revealed increased levels of alpha2, beta1, and beta3 integrin receptors. The highest enzymatic staining intensity for L-selectin, ICAM-1, and MAdCAM-1 was observed in localized peritoneal endometriosis, although such findings were also found in nonendometriosis patients. The activity of alpha2, beta1, and beta3 integrin receptors was strictly related to the microscopic architecture of the peritoneal adipose tissue, in particular to the intravascular de novo formation of microanastomosing capillary vessels in the fat tissue. The results provide novel evidence on the potential role of integrin receptors as markers of the onset and the progression of the endometriosis disease in humans.
