Top Paris fashion retailers who have been the major players in the French high fashion industry for many years, like Pierre Rolland, Oscar de la Renta, Céline and Christian Dior, are on the verge of bankruptcy or already bankrupt and are closing their doors.For years, it has been common knowledge that the big names in fashion were struggling, but there had been no clear indication that they were headed towards bankruptcy and closing of their doors. This week, however, it seems there is no doubt. The first to tell us that this is about to happen, as reported by the Guardian, was Jennifer Close, fashion director of WWD. "Take Christian Dior. Last year they had to make the cuts to their 'Dior Hotel' in Shanghai and they have been losing money for years," said Close. "They are restructuring themselves in anticipation of the end of the booming Chinese fashion market." According to CLOSE, the Chinese are not buying as much Dior as they used to, and for that reason, they are still expecting the company to survive. However, there are too many problems. "The company has lost too much money in recent years, while the new First Lady of China has had to give them all kinds of corporate support to keep them afloat. In the meantime, they have also been hit by yet another recession," said Close. Close says a last ditch attempt to salvage the company is underway. "As part of this process the department stores and department stores outlets are being sold to Qatari Diar, which will try to bring them back to profitability." Even though this is
