It is one of those cities where one would think that everything looks old and really really cool. I came across some cool restaurants, shops, museums and what not, but my favorites had to be the flea market in the park and the toy store. The flea market, located behind the Winter Palace, was actually something I was expecting. You really need to know your way around the city to know where to find all these gems, but the outdoor market is very nice and relaxed. This picture just says it all for me. I couldn ca3bfb1094

News Venezuela: President Maduro blames opposition for food shortage 10 December 2016 Share The Venezuelan president, Nicolás Maduro, has claimed that anti-government protests have led to a food shortage in the country. He said in a televised address that this week's demonstrations - which began on 7 December and have since taken place across the country - are "the Venezuelan people's war". Last week, Maduro said that he had cut government spending to save Venezuela money because the country faced a critical shortage of food and medicine. He claimed that his administration had been trying to get reserves to make up for the shortfall, but had been blocked by "violent sectors" in the opposition. Last week, Maduro said that the government had ordered the country's biggest supermarket chain, Zayti, to release all food in its warehouses in order to prevent the food shortages that have already started. On 6 December, Zayti said it had sold its entire stock of groceries and made a profit of 3.5 million bolivares (USD 8.9 million) from the sales. Zayti's senior vice president, Jhonny Calzadilla, told the Telesur news agency on 10 December that the stores were now full and their shelves had been replenished. He said that about a million sacks of rice and 3.5 million US dollars worth of chicken, egg and milk had been distributed to poor families throughout the country. A Reuters report in 2011 estimated that Venezuela had more than 200,000 tonnes of food stocks in the national warehouse system. Maduro's televised address, posted on the Venezuelan presidency's Twitter account, made no mention of the Zayti supermarket chain. Instead, he claimed that "Venezuela's food production is limited to 100,000 tonnes a month, which means that we can barely fill
