In addition to being a photographer, Michael is an avid motorcycle enthusiast, scuba diving with sharks, snorkeling and working as a marine biologist. He's also a musician, having toured the world with his musical band "Craterface". He enjoys photography and other crafts, spending his free time at his home in Lucca, Italy. Sunday, January 7, 2008 The rolling streets of Rome, Rome itself, and the attractions of the city were overshadowed by the event held for this years World Cup, the greatest spectacle football has ever witnessed, with the exception of the 1979 cup. The participants were the team of Brazil, with the star figure of their team being Pelé, who, amongst other popular personalities, was the spokesman for the organization of the event. Rome itself played an important role in the most incredible and historic event that it had ever seen: in the early morning of 10th July, 150,000 Brazilians invaded the Roman Forum, at first unnoticed, and then with increasing frequency as the crowd rose, until reaching the peak of what would be a hugely positive experience for all, by 11:00 am. The 1960's Brazilian team which was packed with players who'd never played together before, and the match itself, which the Brazilians won convincingly, was highly criticized for having a mythological aura, at least by the press and the public. The vast majority of the Italian fans, on the other hand, was in no way disappointed, and of course the black and yellow flag would become a symbol of Brazilian football in Italy. On 2 August the Argentinean team was
