During the FIFA Global Series in London, EA SPORTS Motion Lab technical director Jon Smeeton discussed the technology behind FIFA 22. But how does it work? And what did the FIFA Global Series real-life training include? Using real footballers as a test group, the training was designed to address FIFA's issues with player creation and animation, which included player awareness of other players. For the player creation and animation aspect of FIFA 22, Motion Lab director Jon Smeeton noted that it was a difficult task as "we're trying to create a highly-detailed model that can not only look amazing but can also interact with the game." The development of FIFA 22's player models saw an investment of "several hundreds of hours," which included watching hours of football on TV and in-person. During testing, the teams at EA Vancouver have documented video footage of players tackling, aerial duels and other activities in-game. "We're capturing all that data," Smeeton said. The data is then fed to the developers at EA Vancouver, who are then able to re-use that real-life motion in training. "What this means is that we're creating the animation in a way that will be in tune with the world that we want to create in FIFA 22," Smeeton said. "We're trying to get the player models as real as possible." Motion capture suit What the players wear has also been discussed at length during the Global Series tests. Smeeton said that the players should be wearing the same type of clothing as what they will be wearing in the real-life football game. "Right now we're looking at football boots, different types of helmets and the correct kit. What we're trying to do is get the feeling of the ball." During the tests at the Leicester Square studio in London, the players wore a brain-tracking suit that tracked brain activity. "What we do with the brain data is that it's all fed back into player animation," Smeeton said. "We're also using that data to try and simulate some of the ball physics.💎"
