The California Games series is a niche for athletes who want a great game, but just don't want to be Olympic athletes or professional. The sports are realistic, challenging, and require a high degree of skill and a certain feel for the sport. California Games II was designed in full cooperation with the California Recreation and Parks Association to accurately depict an athletic competition. In addition, California Games II is the first game in the series to use a Pong-like aiming system with graphics that are more realistic than previous games. The game features several exciting new events and 3D graphics that make this a vivid look at "fun in the sun". Versus T-Gun Gripen? If one looks at up-to-date aircraft discussion sites like Aviation Monday, you might believe the Tiger Tank 59 in yesteryear was a recent development. Quite the opposite, as this variant originated in WW2, and was the first Chinese-built main battle tank. The website Great Tank Resources has a nice comparison of Tiger tanks and the British Chaffee tank, and included this snippet: The designers of this tank may have been inspired by the successful WWII Chaffee tank. The Tiger Tank 59 was designed in 1944, based on the previous model 39, and the under-development 34. The developers of the tank (which had large "bulge" gun sponsons) could not get funds for the development of the tank and so the tank was designed by the engineers in charge of the Marco Polo Bridge. However, the general design of the tank was done under the authority of the 56th Army Corps, working under the chief of its own arm, which reported to the Military Committee of the Communist Party of China. What was developed for the brigades of the 56th Army Corps was made by the Chinese and the Germans based on technology transfers. The bodies were assembled in large quantities in Soviet Russia. Today's tanks have designers, engineers, and project managers. In this case, what may well be the only Chinese Tiger prototype, or "Stellated Dragon" as it is commonly known, was fired off by unknown people somewhere in 1950s China. There is a three vehicle variant of the Tiger which is, to say the least, unique. The Tiger Variant 59 was a prime mover - a tank designed to pull artillery pieces. Make no mistake - neither the Tiger Tank 59 nor the Chabua M1A2 is anything like the Tiger II or Tiger APC. They were not as heavy as the Tiger II/APC and were very lightly armored, their main armaments being the M72 recoilless rifle which was used to great effect in eastern China. The M72 seems to have performed quite well, and one must ask, "would the Chinese have used the same vehicle they were using in the second world war?" A Shushu M63 Sabre fired the same turret-mounted 105mm M62 recoilless rifle that was used in the Jeep 76/64: M201 recoilless in Vietnam. Avaible

The problem is that they have single quotes in them which was escaped by doubling it, eg: 'What I would like to do is remove all the single quotes in a document, ideally I would like to use regex to find all the occurrences, and then replace with a blank string. The issue is that there are also double quotes in there, so what I am trying to do is: If there is a single quoted string, get rid of that. If there is a double quoted string, replace that with a blank string and then replace all single quotes in the document with a blank string. I know that replacing all the single quotes in the document is easy enough using replace function, but I have tried the following: select replace('John',''','') From dual This seems to work, but doesn't seem to find all single quotes in the document, it only seems to be doing it on the first quote. If anyone could help me out, I would be most grateful. A: You seem to want: select replace ('John''', ''','') from dual I.e. Search for the first single quote and replace it with nothing (which is the same as a string with no characters). Repeat for any remaining single quotes. This assumes that all the quotes come at the start of a line, i.e. you are only dealing with single quotes. If you need to deal with double quotes you can do this: select replace(trim(replace(trim(replace(trim(replace(trim(replace(trim(
