Â .Validation of the p300/CBP-associated factor (PCAF) cellular activity assay in primary human lymphoblasts. The p300/CBP-associated factor (PCAF) is a nuclear phosphoprotein that has been shown to regulate several cellular functions, including metabolism, apoptosis, transcription and cell cycle. PCAF has been suggested to be involved in the development of metabolic and cardiovascular disorders as well as cancer, but no quantitative method for monitoring PCAF phosphorylation has been available so far. Here we report on the validation of a novel, high-throughput cellular activity assay for PCAF. Using a panel of three different cell lines and twelve different primary human fibroblast cultures, we could document the validity of the assay, as well as its ability to distinguish between acute and chronic PCAF stimulation.

Moreover, the assay can be performed under adherent and suspension conditions with only a few micrograms of protein per sample. At last, the assay uses a 384-well plate format compatible with high-throughput screening, making it a powerful tool for the identification of novel small molecule modulators of PCAF activity. Babesia microti in humans with multiple relapse. This article describes a case of multiple relapse, to the best of our knowledge, due to infection with Babesia microti. The patient was a 12-year-old girl who developed Lyme disease in 1988 and, 15 months later, was admitted because of meningitis. After completing a three-drug course of doxycycline, her symptoms resolved completely. She was lost to follow-up for one year, until she was seen again with meningitis, and had a neutrophilic pleocytosis and elevated erythrocyte sedimentation rate. She received a three-drug course of tetracycline for Lyme disease, and the
