Not that I'm complaining about the difficulties of life today. Every day brings new challenges, whether it be new technology to master, new strategies to bring to my career, and new friends to connect with. I've come a long way since leaving home, some twenty-odd years ago (if you can believe it!). I learned from my parents, and discovered that I had a knack for teaching from a very young age. Then I learned how to code and become a programmer, and have been lucky to have learned a second language (Italian) since I started university. You might ask yourself what the point of all this is, and I have a similar question. Is this what it's all about? I know that I'm taking things way too far, but if you find the time, write down all that you hate about your job. Be honest about it, but don't make any changes unless it's really a deal breaker. Then, start making goals and building upon them. Maybe you want to work for yourself, maybe your boss is a jerk, maybe you want to be a manager. All of these things are a possibility, and each of them could bring about huge improvements in your life. Another trick I use is having a small set of goals that I constantly work towards. I'm not necessarily working towards a specific position, I just hope to have a career in this space. I'm not just looking for a particular career, I would like to be a programmer or a software engineer, and then create amazing software. So, now, all of these things are in my mind's eye, and I'm always striving to better myself. I hope this helps you as well, I would be very interested to hear about any tips that you have for some of these problems. I'd love to hear how you've moved forward with your life. I'm not sure I can recommend any books,
