Description of the Related Art The base web server system of the present invention relates to the field of film-based photo transparencies and/or video-based images. The photodigitizing industry has recently created a trend toward the conversion of digital images of photographic and video material as disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 5,703,654 to Gillby et al., which is hereby incorporated by reference. For many years, film producers have used a finite supply of rolls of unexposed film. Recently, many efforts have been made to preserve this entire stock of film. A problem with this preservation is the associated technology. In particular, the problem is how to convert film images to an electronic format. Film material is most commonly available in rolls that are 65, 104 or 120 mm in diameter. It is common practice

Enrico de Nicola Enrico de Nicola (, 28 February 1910 – 9 October 2004) was an Italian politician and journalist. He was a secretary of Togliatti and a member of the Italian Communist Party. After his funeral in Rome on 10 October 2004 he was interred at the main hall of the Communist Party at San Paolo Fuori le Mura in Rome. Biography De Nicola was born at Rome on 28 February 1910. He was the son of a veterinary surgeon. After attending a technical school he began to work as a journalist at the weekly magazine La vita nuova, a subsidiary of the communist daily newspaper L'Unità. He joined the Italian Communist Party (PCI) in 1928 and, at the age of twenty, joined the group of exiled communists living in France. During the Risorgimento, he collaborated to the daily Il Popolo. He took part in the reorganization of the PCI, participating in the group known as the PCI New Party (Partito Nuovo), that had been created in December 1943 to "stabilize" the organization of the PCI. It was reorganized again in the mid-1944 as the PCI-PON (Partito Operaio Nuovo), in which de viride, which is \[dichloro(4-chlorobenzene)bis(tritium eta)\]

Tritium, is the radioactive isotope of hydrogen. It is a monovalent radioactive isotope of hydrogen that has an abundance of about 1.6×10^{-7} , or 6.7 atomic parts per million in ordinary terrestrial matter.[2] It is the most commonly used source of tritium, to which it gained this status because it is in high supply (essentially all of it is produced in reactors or accelerator laboratories), and because it is so easily reconstituted, the only means of separating it from the other isotopes in air is the use of filters or condensers, which are unreliable and can be easily clogged. Tritium has widespread use in technology, medicine, and industry. Starting in the 1970s, tritium is finding its way into new waste disposal techniques and into thin-film solar panels.[citation needed] As an isotope, tritium has two nucleus spin states, designated as $3/2+$ and $3/2-$. Due to the presence of an odd number of protons and neutrons, it is an asymmetric nucleus, so each has different masses (having slightly different numbers of neutrons and protons) but the same charge. When two stable isotopes have the same number of neutrons but different numbers of protons, the proton numbers are referred to as "isobars", such as in the case with the most commonly used isotope, stable carbon-12. As with carbon-12, physicists have recognized that "it is possible to take a neutron out of the nucleus of tritium and replace it with a hydrogen nucleus, thus converting tritium to trideuteride ($3H$)," explaining the economic value of tritium. Tritium has the lowest wavelength and therefore the lowest energy, making it the only nuclear reactor moderator. It is highly soluble in water, so that solutions of tritium can be used to make thin transparent, or "fluffy", glass layers for solar cells. Tritium is an industrial chemical, used in the production of, for example, rare-earth magnets, as a radioactive tracer, for neutron radiography, and for medical purposes. Tritium is, in practice, not an inert atom, as it can substitute for non-radioactive hydrogen in many molecules, and thus even if
