Tip For more ways to resize a layer, see here. Figure 7-4 shows the Layers panel with the Hue/Saturation adjustment in progress. The Hue/Saturation adjustment works best with layers that have the same colors, such as for combining elements of an image. And if you're working with shapes, this is the adjustment to use, because it separates colors according to the shapes they belong to. To apply the adjustment, choose Adjustments from the Adjust menu or press Ctrl+I (⌘-I on a Mac). In the dialog box that appears (Figure 7-5, left), you can see the colors for each layer in the image. Photoshop has you covered if you try to change the saturation or hue of any single color. To adjust a color's saturation and hue, you can click the color swatches that appear beside the color's names to display a color overlay. The overlay shows a preview of that color's effect on the color layer. You can tweak the color to your heart's content. To return to the original layer, click one of the color swatches again to hide the overlay. To return to the preview image, click the icon at the bottom left of the palette.

[Mechanism of the formation of a morphogenetic center in Caenorhabditis nematodes]. The development of sexual dimorphism in Caenorhabditis nematodes, studied up to the last larval stage, was compared with that in Drosophila. There is a close similarity in the time course and morphology of events in the formation of the morphogenetic center. A factorial analysis of patterns of appearance of genes and products of their expression in C. elegans (hunchback, ceh-20, hbp, ceh-14, hsp-16.41, hsp-16.47, vs-1) and D. melanogaster (hsp-16.41) led to a conclusion that these genes are the effectors of the development of certain structures common to nematodes and insects. The fact that these nematodes have the same genes regulating the development of a morphogenetic center points to a close phylogenetic relationship between Caenorhabditis and Drosophila species. The comparison of data obtained in these two experimental systems proved that the morphogenetic center in C. elegans is a structure in the anteriormost precursor of the nervous system, which is supplied by cerous epidermis.
