Universities and colleges that receive federal funding for research face a conundrum: how to meet their obligations under the federal law that requires them to release related research results, known as the Research Works Act of 2005, without causing a price increase for the data. Because the government is now collecting funds for research in a new way, a relatively small number of research institutions also have additional safety nets under the law's unintended consequences provision. One outcome is that the federal government might save money through the more limited collection of research data and publications. Another potential scenario is that some federally funded researchers might face greater pressure from funder compliance offices and the news media to share their results, which could lead to more restrictive research conduct. "What we're seeing now is a consideration of data as research assets in a way that I think people haven't been considering before," said Sarah Cumming, a professor of law at the University of Michigan Law School and co-director of its information law program. The University of Michigan and a few other institutions have a formula that allows them to comply with the law without having to make wholesale price increases, according to university officials. Because the funding formulas for these institutions are based on the cost of acquiring expensive data, these researchers have the financial means to absorb the increased costs of the research, they said. "The institution
