What's new:

In recent days, the GROG campaign has faced an astonishing attack upon even the most remote and obscure of their vaunted fortresses. It's the first time it's come close to falling, and while it has been lost and retaken, it has not been breached. As was evident after the Ebon Fencer's space-shifting attack, several events have occurred in the heads of the GROG multiverse that have led to a sudden, terrifyingly violent, and wholly uncharacteristic outburst of their less-than-holy enemy, the Necromancer Lords (or Eldeath Kallimera, to give them their full and proper title). The revelation comes completely out of the blue, exactly as the birdsong of the cranes heralded the Demacian Witchfinder's arrival; and where-ever the enemy chooses to strike, they cause our heroes to abandon all security measures, all planned defenses, and all their notions of what to expect - it's as if they decided there's only one option for any Marauders, no matter how godly or civilized their laws and order; and have therefore decided to destroy everything in their immediate path. In less than two weeks, the Ebon Fencer has made a sudden appearance as far as the White Tower itself, and has struck out at the monks of Lycastus. In less than a month, she's also struck at Sunless Drake Haven itself, and who knows where she might have gone next. The recent additions to Kaer Maga - rumblings of evil Ebon and the Gods and Immortals - and the arrival of that rogue force in Ebon, all may well have provoked this new thrust at the hermit-kings' mighty walled cities. Little is known of where they came from, or what they have been doing. After leaving their cursed lands of the Necromancer Lords in a flurry of fireworks and molten slag, they have set out to wreak some chaos. Not only might this be the result of a new campaign against the GROG forces that would send them in search of a bladed-sprit-bearer, a curse to be wrought on them by the murderous Necromancer Lords, but it's clear that for once they are on the march, having no real strictures about where they are going. The fact that the Necromancer Lords be-came our ENEMIES
