Correct Download Windows 7 Loader v2.1.5 (x86/x64) by DAZ.Following a two-year legal battle, the U.S. Supreme Court on Wednesday struck down California's pro-germline-therapy law. The decision is a setback to the reproductive rights movement and its activists, who have long warned that such laws pose a particular threat to the reproductive health rights of women. The ruling is a victory for Californian couples who seek to make family medical decisions, or carry out assisted reproduction, together. The legal battle over California's law was initially brought in 2012, when two couples, Jayne Rowse and Stan Marks, and Beth Ireland and Stacey Schwalbach, sought a medical procedure that would allow them to access their frozen eggs and embryos for treatment. In 2012, Rowse and Marks, who are not related, came together to conceive a child, following a year of relationship-building. Only Marks would carry the baby. The couple chose to freeze six eggs from Rowse, who underwent fertility treatments, to prepare for the couple's eventual planned family. But Marks, who owns a successful contracting business, wanted to use his eggs and embryos to keep the seeds of his own genes alive. Fearing that Rowse's eggs and embryos would be kept for storage at a fertility clinic in order to be used by other couples, Marks, together with Ireland and Schwalbach, challenged the California law at the Supreme Court. The law had required couples to prove that their desires to use their reproductive tissue in treatment "is intended to increase or improve the well-being of the intended parents or the intended parents' children." Before the court's ruling, advocates and family-rights groups said the law was an unconstitutional burden on couples seeking to have their own children. "The court recognized California's right to regulate assisted reproductive technology, but here California went too far and California's informed consent law is discriminatory," said Brigitte Ammons, vice president of programs and strategy at the American Civil Liberties Union.
