Q: How to create a Qt/C++ class like vtkCompositeDataSet for Qt? I'm looking for a way to create instances of vtkCompositeDataSet (and any subclass thereof) for Qt. These are wrappers that are found in the vtk module of VTK, and wrapped with Python, but I'm looking to create these structures directly in my Qt application. I would like to implement a class that would help me create these. I want to mimic the API in vtk (and in Python) as much as possible. Preferably, I would want to write a wrapper API for it, but that's not a must, since that's not too difficult as well. I'm just looking for a fairly generic way to handle this case. Looking at vtk's documentation, I saw that they are using a class vtkPythonCompositeDataSet to do this. Can anybody point me to some documentation on that class? A: I wrote the code to wrap the vtkPythonCompositeDataSet class. I did it partly in C++, partly in Python, and partly in Cython. In short, you can see it here: I made it somewhat simple and completely generic. See the usage docs for examples. Q: What is this strange filesystem structure in my nix file system? I have had a couple of conversations with other NixOS users, trying to figure out what this is so I can relate it to my own setup. I have a script for installing a web application which runs fine. When I do a nix-env -i program I also get the following output: ... libc.so.6

You have a laptop and an old game you've played once or twice before, sitting on your desk. You open it up, click play and bask in the nostalgia of such an old game. And, before you know it, you realise you've been staring at the same screen for over 20 minutes and you know the feeling of a once-close friend-turned-enemy emerging from the fog of defeat, so you decide to load another level... and you get bored of that game as well, you just load some other game and do that... and it's not an RPG, not a space game, not a beautiful game, not a anything game, and yet you still continue doing that. And before you know it you're watching TV for another 30 minutes and you realise that you're losing your house to the buy out, and it's only been a couple hours since you got in. So, you try to take a couple days off to relax a little... but by the third day, you are using up all of your spare time and go back to work like you were working before! By the end of the week, you're just throwing in the towel and starting college, just so you can play some other game on your phone or laptop. [/i] By this point, you realise that this is a very boring way to go through life. And after you come home, you fire up your laptop to log in to your online gaming community, but you haven't been there for so long. And before you know it, you start regretting all of those years of gaming and how it used to be for you, and then you start looking at your window and remember how beautiful the sunsets used to be, and how nice the people on the trains used to be and how nice the redone barn you passed that one time looked. And all of a sudden you realise that all that video game addiction really sucked, because you never thought that one day you'd need to take a
