Tori Spelling is giving her career on the big screen a twist. According to E! News, Spelling has signed on to star in a Netflix original film. Spelling will play Anita Blake, a San Diego-based vampire hunter with a knack for dismembering the undead. The film, which will reportedly be based on Spelling's well-received web series Darkfever, is currently in production and will be released through the streaming platform on July 24. Netflix has reached out to Spelling for comment. Spelling, who has admitted to struggling with postpartum depression, has been keeping a low profile ever since she filed for divorce from Dean McDermott after learning she was pregnant with her first child, Kingston, in 2015. The actress has also spent time in the medical marijuana field, which she discusses in her recent memoir, See You in My Garden: A True Story of Murder and Memoir. Spelling, who shares son Charlie with McDermott, also raised eyebrows after she appeared in a series of revealing bathing suit photos for the cover of the August issue of Playboy. "She has a dramatic persona," Spelling's ex McDermott, who worked with her on the Darkfever series, told E! News at the time. "She has a really strong, extremely strong, personality. She can get really mad, she can really get on the edge, but she's not a bitch. I think she's misunderstood and I think she's beautiful and that they [Darkfever fans] will appreciate that."The present invention relates to a method of sputtering a metal target made of an alloy comprising several metals, in which at least two opposite cathodes are provided as targets for metal atoms, more specifically steel, onto which the metal atoms are sputtered from the two opposite cathodes. In the field of magnetron sputtering, the target is generally made of ferromagnetic material. A ferromagnetic material has a strong tendency to become saturated by a magnetic field. Therefore, the high conductivity of the ferromagnetic target decreases with increasing magnetic field. As a result of this, the target becomes heated when
