Thanks to JaQy for suggestion! A: If i remember correctly, "Empathy" is a word that is hard to translate. You can use the verb "mieuriser" (to understand each other) but if you notice the sentence fragment

when you move to the second paragraph, it says "Et s'il s'emprunte ce qui vous est cher" (And if he borrows the thing that is dear to you) So maybe you can remove it.

EDIT: looking closer at your question i see what you're trying to say. If you find yourself in a situation where you have to prove who is the bigger bad guy, i think you have to use the adjective "gros" (big) and the verb "déchirer" (to tear) instead of "emprunter" and "emprunter". So, yeah, in your case "To tear something bigger is to borrow something from someone that is bigger than you" I hope that helped you :)

Best of luck Erlang for the Masses - pchristensen ===== tsally This article was written a bit before Erlang was released, and it seems to have some rather fundamental flaws. I can't actually find the source of the misperception that Erlang can produce "2 KLOCs of DLL per minute", but it's still quite likely mistaken. There is a section near the end that says a very specific number of LOCs for a system that connects back to Erlang (another number is said to come from a source slightly to the right of where it was written). The numbers that are actually mentioned are the result of no reasonable application of Erlang to real-world problems. It'd be easy to make a case for either claim, though. For example, the Noun Project is a collaborative open source effort to build an English-language naming dictionary for a wide variety of terms and subjects. The project is modeled on Wikipedia, and has been around for about 7 years. Wikipedia includes over 36,000 unique articles. The Noun Project is beginning to feel its way into the real world. They're currently pushing ~200 new articles per day, and they 6d1f23a050
