In particular, the VONI standard defines an architecture for enabling a telephone or data communications device to be configured as a VONI phone. This allows the device to be used to engage in voice and data communications with other VONI telephony devices. For example, a user can use a VONI phone to engage in voice calls on behalf of a third party. In some instances, the third party is a subscribing VONI phone. The VONI standard also provides for the implementation of services as it was envisioned at the time of the standard's development. These services include call forwarding, forwarding calls to other devices, initiating calls on behalf of another party (sometimes referred to as call escrow), as well as various other call transfer services. The H.248/H.248+ standard defines a series of interfaces that can be used to make and receive calls on behalf of a third party. The H.248/H.248+ standard (and later amendments) describes how to set up a VONI call, and how to answer and perform calls on behalf of a third party. The H.248/H.248+ standard defines the interfaces between a VONI communication device and other telecommunications devices and services such as the services listed above c6a93da74d
