paribam public administration pdf 640 In an effort to prevent deaths and improve maternal and child health services in areas where MMR is much higher, lower than desired, than in other areas, we created an innovative, multi-level delivery model called the Sure Creek Maternal and Child Health Fund (SC-MCH). This model deployed three types of funds: a learning fund to accelerate the change of in-need local health departments, a facility fund to increase service capacity at health facilities, and an impact fund to hire community health workers to provide outreach services. SC-MCH targeted health departments in high-, moderate- and low-mortality and high- and moderate-immunization risk areas and focused on developing and implementing policies, infrastructure and an improved practice culture to eliminate barriers of maternal and child services and ensure a sustainable improvement of the risk behaviors of mothers and their children.

This innovative delivery model can scale to fund local health departments and health facilities and hire community health workers in the first-year to reduce by 1. Epidemiology and etiology of infectious diarrhea is a public health problem worldwide. A large number of viral, bacterial, and parasitic organisms, as well as some unclassified organisms, cause diarrhea. The major microbial agents of diarrhea are represented by three genera of bacteria, viruses, and parasites. However, the etiology of most cases of enteric infectious diarrhea has yet to be determined. In a prospective study to determine the prevalence of bacterial diarrhea in children with acute diarrhea, the etiology of acute diarrhea in children was assessed.

While studying public administration, students can learn about the functions of the public sector; revenue collection; management of public utilities, and the regulatory framework of the public sector; the role of states and the federals in development, management and planning. Further, they can learn about the mechanisms employed in planning and development in designing policies for the service delivery; how national plans are translated into plans at the local level; and how the private sector is integrated into the country's developmental programmes. This is highly relevant in India where NREGA is a programme to ameliorate the poverty and change its conditions of work and deliverance.

In India, fundamental issues in public policy and administration are quite complex, as multiple issues require simultaneous decisions made by government leaders; both central and state governments are involved in planning; and each level has its own laws and standards. The bureaucracy of the Indian public administration is distinguished by its application of a centralised plan of operations. Masses of research have been conducted on the functioning of the Indian public administration in the context of India's recent history and political environment. Current issues include development of administrative reforms, using the Internet for public administration, the role of the administrative system in determining development, the relevance of decentralisation in the context of the federal structure of India, and the quest for more meaningful local government. An effective public administration is much needed in India. Economic liberalisation has brought important changes in the country's economy which brings on its way new opportunities for growth, prosperity and better lifestyle for the Indian population. What impact these changes have had on the way policy is made and implemented in society is an important subject. The maintenance of an effective civil administration is also a critical prerequisite for providing the requisite services to citizens and investors in the new India. 5ec8ef588b
