used by edsac and the early zil. this is one of the older main memory management modes. since its introduction in april 1977, it has been further developed and is available in ibm's mainframe operating systems, system i. within edsac, it was superseded by syserm, which is the current mode used by edsac. in order to close gaps in their memories and swap in storage space as required, edsac would therefore enter a state known as extended read mode (erm). the number of read and write instructions and data words would be increased and the input and output data streams would be kept in synchronism with main memory.
