according to a study published in the journal science in 2003, crack cocaine may be more addictive than heroin. it is more likely to cause psychotic behavior and neurological damage, such as brain damage and damaged nerve cells. crack's high is also more intense than other drugs, which can be more easily abused by women. finally, crack's high is short-lived and less likely to cause a "runner's high" than heroin's high. in the study, women who used crack were more likely to be addicted to and abuse other drugs than women who used heroin. crack is an amphetamine and is an extremely addictive stimulant. people who take it report feeling more energized and alert than they did before they started using it, and they sometimes have difficulty sleeping because they feel so wired. because of its potency, crack's use is associated with numerous health problems, especially in people who use it with other drugs. for instance, people who mix crack and marijuana may experience an increased heart rate, and they are at risk for blood clots, heart attacks, and strokes. researchers have also linked crack use to seizures, heart problems, high blood pressure, and seizures. crack is a highly addictive stimulant. according to the national institute on drug abuse, it is the most addictive of all the street drugs. the research institute reports that some people will experience withdrawal symptoms, such as irritability, insomnia, and cramps when they try to stop using it. crack also has a tendency to cause the user to become paranoid and agitated. crack is a potent, addictive stimulant. it has an extremely high potency. most people who use crack will experience some level of withdrawal symptoms, such as depression, anxiety, irritability, insomnia, and cramps, when they attempt to quit using it.

in research published in december, harald frey of the university of california, berkeley, and colleagues report that they have developed a prototype of a crack-sealing product that they hope to commercialize in the near future. the prototype is based on a polyurethane that is safe to handle and easy to apply to a crack, the researchers say. the researchers say their product is designed to stop any water, including water from a leaky pipe or a wet floor, from entering the crack. the resin will not damage the surrounding concrete or masonry, they say. the researchers have tested the crack-pac on a bench-top model to demonstrate that it will not cause an explosion, a fire or a puncture of the surrounding concrete or masonry. the resin can be used to seal cracks that are up to 1/32-inch wide. a different version of the resin will be used in the prototype, which will be tested in a number of laboratory and animal tests. the researchers hope to commercialize the crack-pac as a separate product or as part of a kitset with a prefilled plastic syringe and nozzle. by incorporating the crack-pac in a kitset, the product will be easier to apply to a wide variety of cracks, the researchers say. the crack-pac flex-h2o polyurethane injection resin seals leaking cracks, voids or fractures from 1/32 to 1/4 wide in concrete or solid masonry. designed to perform in applications where water is seeping or mildly leaking from the crack, the polyurethane is packaged in the cartridge and an accelerator is packaged in the nozzle. when the resin encounters water as it is injected into the crack, it becomes an expanding foam that provides a flexible seal in leaking and non-leaking cracks. 5ec8ef588b
