When the show began, there was a sense that House was the worlds Dr. McCoy. He was ruthless and showy, a bit of an ass, but in the end, doing what had to be done to save lives. Over time, however, the show became a vehicle to champion the idea that doctors, like everyone else, should also have compassion. In order for House to reach a diagnosis, all information must be available in a proper format before House can begin. An example of this is the case study. House wants to know the patient history, diagnose the patient properly and get an accurate report from the Socratic method to finish. Without this knowledge, House cannot diagnose the patient properly. I love those moments that House highlights great MDs, and Dr. Foreman is no exception. House gives this Doctor a chance to shine. Foreman takes the time to listen to the audience question and offer his professional opinion, making sure the audience understands why he is giving his opinion in this particular way. This is the kind of high-stakes medical drama the audience craves, and it's presented with a perfect balance of humor, tension and frank talking. Of all the critical case episodes, this one is my favorite, because it's just so damn exciting and tense and fast-paced. The many guest stars added to the show make it more interesting, and the cases add to the tension. One of my favorite parts of the whole series is the part when House is deciding who should move into the new west wing and who should move out. Guest stars work like crazy, and everyone just has to be in the right place at the right time. When I watch this episode, I get excited and feel like I'm there.

House M.D.: Critical Cases

It was one of the failures of the naughts that some doctors on TV seem to come from the bottom of a barrel, perhaps because a majority of practicing physicians are soured by the public's misunderstanding of science and its reliance on health care myth and marketing. House is a good representation of this trend. House can be very nice, and very understanding, which makes it especially pitiable when he is at his crankiest. In general, he is almost always wrong: he is arrogant, he is ill-tempered, he is the smartest guy in the room and his ego is so jacked up, he can't hear reason. He looks like a sad, college dropout fat bastard even with all the cosmetic surgery. As much as it can be argued that House is not the best example of medicine, it's important to remember that he has a reputation among doctors, because of his intelligence and his outstanding work, as well as his mean disposition. That makes it easier to dismiss his conclusions as nonsense. His world view of medicine, however, is far from fantasy and he is often right. But why is it that a lot of doctors think that House is true to life, while most make excuses for this latter episode's wild leaps of science, and the accuracy of the diagnosis often is almost non-existent? It is certainly the case that the show was made for an educated, somewhat cynical audience, and that you don't have to be a brain surgeon to appreciate it. But it was also the case that, since the naughts, the shows appeal to a growing number of medical professionals who are active in scientific fields. These professionals have found the show entertaining and useful in understanding something about the world of medicine, but the show has become a bit of a cottage industry for educated medical professionals, and the show often gets too much credit for accuracy. 5ec8ef588b
