Now that I've upgraded my Mac to the latest version of lightroom CC, I am finding that the program is actually slower than it was before. When opening a project I open the new project with lightroom 1.3.1 and once completed I then use the plugin to update to the new lightroom 5.2. The new update seems to take some time as I have found that the Navigate tool takes over a minute to find a location. It also brings up the question is whether I really need to the program running twice. It has to be rethought that if I need to render out images, then wait a few minutes for the update to do it's work. It would be nice if there was an option to keep the various versions open at once, not closing down the previous version before it is finished. I have found that opening two versions of the same project at the same time and using the command line finish the update while the image containing the work in progress doesn't. I have been using CC for a while now, and much as I look forward to CC:2017, what I am most excited about are the new AE features. With the first versions of Lightroom there was little difference between the application and Adobe After Effect in terms of capability. I have never felt the need for the editing tools in Lightroom to be as functional as those in After Effects. But now, with the new release, using the new features in CC it is the fastest way to do AE work I have ever found, while having access to some of the latest AE features — the new motion controls, the advanced color adjustment tools, and the new Gradient Map work. When it comes to blending, there is a new interface which is much easier to understand than the old version. However, the Blend tool is becoming more powerful. Instead of blending separate layers, you can now blend layers and directly manipulate the individual layer opacity

This is a great tool to help people new to AE enter into the world of compositing. There are still some issues with the color handling, making the color not always be the same as the mask when using gradient maps, but I recommend this as the best way to get into the world of compositing. I think we'll see the editing speed of CC:2017 continue to increase with the new release of Pro.
