In my UIViewController, I have a UITableView that is presented modally over my main UIViewController. In my UITableView, I have a button and I want it to invoke a method in the UIViewController when the button is pressed. For the most part, I can figure out how to do this by setting up an action. My problem is that when I do this, my view appears on top of the other view. I want the button to be underneath the other view when I tap on it. Is there a way to do this? A: I want the button to be underneath the other view when I tap on it. Is there a way to do this? Use a UITableViewController (or UIViewController if you don't need a table) to present the modally presented view controller. Q: What if I migrate from Microsoft SQL Server to PostgreSQL? I've been working in Microsoft SQL Server for many years. I'm doing a project using ASP.NET MVC, Entity Framework, LINQ-to-SQL and SQL Server to build a website. I heard PostgreSQL is an excellent database that is actively developed and you can actually change some of the core design of the database with these extensions. What would be the best decision if I were to migrate from SQL Server to PostgreSQL. I can see both pros and cons on both sides. A: The good news is that you'll find the same tools for PostgreSQL in your toolbox, such as Entity Framework and LINQ-to-SQL. The bad news is that your data model will not be the same. Think of the physical layout of the database, and of the data that you have. The physical layout is the same, but the data is different. SQL Server will store the same data, it will just store it in a different format. SQL Server will happily handle the same data, assuming that you build your model accordingly. Now, suppose that you want to store different data in different places. You could use different entities, and create different tables with different names, but the data is the same, and all of the logical things are there: class Person { public int Id
