I don't really want to add a remote script into my site, it feels a bit dirty. Instead, is there any way to do this that would be acceptable by all the major browsers, and that would allow me to have multiple frames, and still allow communication between the frames? A: You should use an AJAX request to load the contents of the iframe into the main page. See here for how to send an AJAX request. If that page can't be loaded in an iframe (i.e., due to cross-domain security restrictions) then you can't use iframes for this purpose. You can use XHRs or JSON-P, depending on your preferences for AJAX communications. If you need to specify different content for each frame, you should look into setting each frame to a different content type using the different types of iframe. Q: Django In-Memory Model or Prefetch? I have a non-persisted model in Django, but I have a specific set of circumstances where I'd like to create a persisting model for it. Is there any good reason to just use a prefetch, or is an in-memory model just as appropriate for this? A: The in-memory model is definitely the way to go for such a scenario. The prefetch related approach is not recommended unless you're running on a persistent backend like postgres or postgres-XL, etc. Q: Using CSS and HTML, is it possible to make a button to appear when an image changes from src="none" to src="image1.jpg" and back to "none" I'm trying to create a button which shows an image based on a change in an attribute. The first time the image src changes to "none", nothing shows on the button. The second time the image changes from "none" to "image1.jpg", the button should show an image and remain there until the image changes back to "none". Here is my html:

We start out with a short interview with an anonymous music collector to learn that he scavenged through trash, sold scrap paper, and ditched school to save up to buy the album, which he thought was beyond his price range. We get some good track by track thoughts and move onto seeing and playing the album in its entirety. The artists and producers on the album include: Henry Coward : Brother Goot, JohnIngham, Henry Fielder, Wigmore. Derek Wadsworth : Bass, Co-producer. Don Box : Guitar. Julian Bream : Flute. Arnold Marsen : Harmonica. We bring you to Goot's Gadet guitar studio and watch live, as we see the... published: 10 Jun 2012 Jethro Tull - Heavy Horses (1975) SUBSCRIBE for More FREE Documentaries: The GermanNavy has withdrawn its records of the minesweeping squadron it sent to the Mediterranean Sea on the eve of the WW2 in an attempt to find evidence of the German Navy's attack on the British fleet in the mediterranean and other mine fields in operation during the war. The GermanNavy was in need of mine sweepers. It had been stripped of many of its ships. Those it had been waiting to receive at the end of the war were gone. And those it had been using were quickly being broken up. At the time of this writing, nobody has access to the list of equipment carried by the Minesweeping squadron. A source that has 79a2804d6b
