In this testimony before the Foreign Affairs Subcommittee of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, Ambassador William Burns warns that Pyongyang has been an international threat for years, but that it is not a threat to deter militarism and war. He says that the U.S. National Security Strategy and the U.S. National Defense Strategy - the President's most recent National Security Strategies - are "not strategies of deterrence." Indeed, according to Burns, deterrence is precisely the wrong strategy to use. He says that it would be better to adopt a "strategy of prevention." The ambassador's views come shortly after North Korea claimed to have detonated a "hydrogen bomb" - an assertion that Pyongyang has made many times before. According to a report by the state-run Korea Herald, North Korea claimed its test was a "powerful explosion" that was 50 times more powerful than its last test. It is not clear why North Korea did not mention its weapons capacity in the report. The Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) has said that North Korea's nuclear program poses an "immediate threat" to the United States. In a report published in January of this year, the DIA warned: North Korea is on a quest to acquire nuclear weapons that can be used against the U.S. homeland. Pyongyang has not fully tested, or demonstrated any ability to miniaturize a nuclear weapon and mount it on a ballistic missile, posing a realistic threat with a nuclear weapon. Despite the assertions of U.S. officials, North Korea is not a threat to the United States militarily. The North Korean Army's armaments in South Korea are somewhat antiquated, and are often held up in the country's economy. The North Korean Air Force, which has multiple fighter jet squadrons, is often trained on obsolete equipment. However, the North Korean Army and Air Force can conduct a conventional attack against South Korea, and the North's artillery could easily hit Seoul. The North's U.N. Weapons of Mass Destruction are a relatively small force, and the extent of
